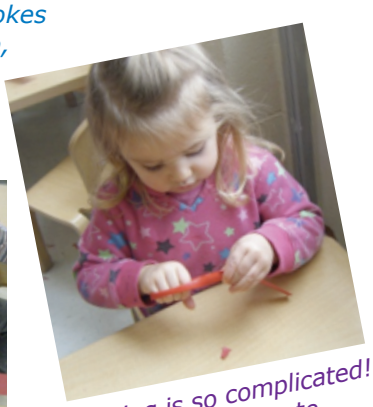
I'm so proud of my work! Look at all that I'm learning!

It may look like scribbles, but I'm building up the muscles I'll need in order to write. I'm also learning the strokes I'll use: up and down, side to side, diagonal, and curves and circles.

Circle time! Put your hands ABOVE your head! (And practice spacial awareness with the use of position/direction words such as above.)

I am playing out roles that I've observed, trying to figure it all out.

Cutting is a complicated skill to learn. Which way do I hold the scissors? How do I use my helper hand?



Cutting is so complicated! How do I coordinate open-close-open-close? How do I add holding and turning while coordinating open-close?

This takes much concentration. But look, I've got the scissors the right way, my helper hand is holding the page…I'm on my way to mastering this complicated task.

Which way do these scissors go again?

I am also learning something way more important than technical skills and way harder to see: a life long love of learning.

We're learning how to be and have a friend. Most of the time, it goes pretty good.
